"'Twas a gala time in Washington," remarked an old citizen a short time before his death, a few years ago, "when the You remember the building better as the infirmary immediately north of the court house, which was destroyed by fire in the early part of 1861, but its appearance had been much changed from the original. The time was, I think, in the summer of 1803, and I was a boy about nine years old, living near by, and I do not remember that was any speaking. I do, however, recollect that the people made it a time for a jollification in the shape of a barbecue. South of the site there were long taties laden with eatables and plenty of drinkables.

"The building was of brick, a plain oblong of two stories, one end being set apart for the keeper's family, the other portions, with grated windows, being for the prisoners. The main entrance was midway on the south front, just about where the park watchman's house now stands. Additions, first of wings at the ends, and an additional story were found necessary, for, under the duty of the marshal of the District to keep and maintain the United States prisoners he also had debtors, runaway slaves, and in the early days the corporation prisoners to board, and, as the population increased, so did the number of inmates of the jail. The jail was under the charge of the marshal, and that officer placed one of his deputies in immediate charge from time to time as occasion required, other deputies assisting him. I think that the first deputy in charge was one Keenan, and he was followed by Tippet, Burr and Williams, the last named about 18:0, and about 18:7, under the marshalship of Gen. Hunter, Mr. Robert Ball, father of the late Col. Bob Ball, became the jailer or warden.

Had a Whipping Post.

"Around this structure was a high wall nclosing a not extensive yard, in which the prisoners were allowed some exercise, and in this inclosure was the whipping post at which the lash was used. It was a white man, I believe, who afterward became a man, I believe, who afterward became a highly respectable citizen, who received the last flogging at this post.

"It was when Mr. Ball was jailer that the Blue Jug prison was built—about 1839. This was a three-storied brick building, located in an inclosure at the northeast cofner of Judiciary Square, with the cell rooms on the north side, separated from quite comfortable rooms on the opposite side intended for the confinement of debtors and the lighter offenders. This building was erected under Architect Robert Mills by the Stanton Bros., bricklayers, of Alexandria, each of whom subsequently practiced at the bar and became members of Congress—Fred P. from Tennessee, and Richard from Kentucky. For thirty years the Blue Jug was the Jail for the District, till 1869, when the new stone structure on the Eastern branch was completed.

Old Jail and Infirmary.

"On the vacation of the first-named buildng (in the center of Judiciary Square) there was an attempt made to convert it into a hospital for the insane. This unfortunate class had been cared for in no specified class had been cared for in no specified manner previous to this time, the more violent being confined in jail at the cost of their friends, if not indigent, and if so by the corporation, while some were supported in Mount Hope, Baltimere, As stated, this effort failed and the building was placed in charge of the Medical Society of the District and was for overstwenty years the Washington infirmary, and in the early part of the war used as a government hospital, the victims of the attack on the 4th Massachusetts Regiment, on April 19, 18th, being the first military patients. In less than a year it took fire and burned.

Memorable Hanginifis. Memorable Hangings.

"I remember a number of executions, and saw the first, which was in 1803 or 1814. An Irishman, Patrick McGurk, killed his wife in a drunken frenzy and was tried at the Capitol, in the old Senate chamber, the Capitol, in the old Senate chamber, I believe, which is now the Supreme Court room. The killing was at his home on F street near lith. The United States jail had not been finished, and he was confined in a temporary one in the alley near the present mail bag repair shop, and I followed him to near the foot of the Capitol, where he was hung.

"The next was a colored man, hung at the jail for a felonious assault on a white woman in the jail about 1814. About four years later a white man named Clarke was hung there. About 1823 there was much excitement because a hanging did not occur. The government had here a number of cavalry soldiers for duty as mounted messengers, quartered north of the treasury. A servent of come of the co

He was tried, convicted and sentenced to be hung. The gallows was erected a little north of G between 4th and 5th streets, north of G between 4th and 5th streets, and an immense crowd gathered to witness the execution. The minutes lengthened into hours and the crowd became impatient at the delay. The prisoner was, however, made ready, and just as the marshal started from the jall a reprieve was received from the Fresident prolonging the prisoner's life six months. This news reaching the crowd caused much indignation, for the crime was looked on by the community as a cold-blooded one, and had the prisoner been outside the jall I am confident he would not have been safe. I believe the sentence was subsequently commuted to imprisonment for life."

CURIOSITIES OF SUICIDE. ome True Stories Concerning Its

From the Loadon Telegraph. At the conclusion of a recent inquest on John Brooks, an engineer of Upton Park Manor, who flung himself off the Royal Sovereign while the vessel was nearing Southend on her return journey from Margate, Mr. Wood, the deputy coroner, made ome remarks calculated to surprise the uninitiated, but only the uninitiated. He said that apparently the case was one of those which made up the terrible epidemic of sui-cide in and near London recently. This is what students of psychology call "suicide what students of psychology call "suicide through imitation," or, as Mr. Wood correctly termed it, "epidemical suicide." As a rule, though, civil communities are less prone to it than military ones. It has happened several times before now that a soldier having hanged himself in a barrack room, or having put a bullet through his brain in a sentry box, the drama was repeated for many days under similar conditions without the authorities being able to put a stop to the recurrence otherwise than by changing the regiment's quarters. The most notable case on record occurred in 1805, in the camp at Boulogne, when Napoleon was preparing, or pretending to prepare, a descent upon England. The regiment was sent inland, and it was on that occasion the emperor enunciated the famous axiom in a general order, "The soldier who kills himself is practically a deserter." More than a quarter of a century later a dozen veterans hanged themselves in as many days from a nail in one of the corridors of the Hotel des Invalides, in Paris. The nail was removed and the epidemic ceased.

Available Farm Lands in the South From the Southern Farm Magazine.

Young farmers starting out are invited to nvestigate the undeveloped farm lands of the south. There are at present thousands of acres of as fertile land as was ever devoted to agriculture upon which the virgin timber still stands, and this land may be purchased at a very low price, in many cases the cost scarcely equaling the returns which may be realized from the timber upon the land. For young men with push, perseverance and industry there are splendid homes to be carved out of the untilled lands of the south. Generally the land may be purchased on easy terms, and the payments so arranged through a series of years that each year they will not be more burdensome than the payment of rent in other places. These southern lands are bound in a few years to be taken up and developed by active farming people, and as adjoining farms are improved and towns and cities of wealth and culture spring up around them, as is now rapidly being done in many sections of the south, land values will increase, so that in a few years a farm costing at the present-time from $3 to $10 an acre will be worth possibly from $25 to $50, and that while each year it has been paying expenses and a profit on the investment. push, perseverance and industry there are
